

Our school is an international crucible for the assimilation of ideas and customs; a place for mingling where there is a synthesis forming a common nexus amongst people and beliefs. We, of course, experience the rituals or rushing for books, and the borrowing of pens, of salutations and jokes, all that would be considered as typical pre-class confusion, but here, there's a multi-lingual collage of cultures. Nationalities that, by some standards, are not even supposed to co-exist, live and work together in an atmosphere of self-developed harmony.

Learning of the purely academic is a matter of course, but perhaps more important, is learning about ourselves and those that surround us. This situation, we hope, will germinate in us, if it has not already, an understanding and appreciation of mankind.
